

Anxiety & PD *

y

You're Doing Better Than You Think

You're Doing Better Than You Think

A message about anxiety, Parkinson's, and being human

Let's talk about something that doesn't get said out loud enough: anxiety and Parkinson's often travel together and that doesn't mean you're weak, failing, or "not coping well enough."

I live with anxiety myself. I've had my own struggles, and I still do. This isn't something you just "fix" and move on from. It's something you learn to understand, work with, and soften over time. Some days are easier. Some days are heavier. That's human.

When you're living with Parkinson's, anxiety makes complete sense. Your nervous system is already working harder. Your brain is constantly processing movement, balance, timing, and uncertainty. Add fear of symptoms, fear of falling, fear of the future and it's no wonder anxiety shows up.

Here's the important part: anxiety is not a personal flaw. It's a nervous system response. It's your body trying sometimes clumsily to protect you.

The Good News: Nervous Systems Can Be Trained

This is one of the reasons exercise especially the kind we do is so powerful. Not because it makes Parkinson's disappear, but because it sends a powerful signal to your brain: "I am capable. I am moving. I am safe enough in this moment."

Every time you show up, even on the hard days, you're doing more than exercising your body. You're teaching your nervous system that it doesn't have to stay stuck in fear.

If you struggle with anxiety, please know this

You are not alone

You are not behind

You are not doing this wrong

What Progress Really Looks Like

Progress doesn't always look like feeling calm. Sometimes progress looks like showing up anyway. Sometimes it looks like taking breaks. Sometimes it looks like giving yourself permission to have a tough day without judgment.

Be gentle with yourself. I'm learning to do the same.

And remember this space is not about perfection. It's about support, consistency, and learning how to live well with what you're carrying, not fighting yourself every step of the way.

You are worthy of compassion.
You are stronger than you realize.
You're doing better than you think.

-Christine

